TIMBER FOUND IN NEW YORK.

The Varieties of Trees Which Are Still Flourishing and Their Uses.

In the forests of northern New York State there are upward of fifty varieties of trees covering nearly 4,000,000 acres. This is a remarkable thing when the forests made upon the woodlands of other less populous States are taken into consideration. In New York in many instances within the last few years handsome houses have been built exclusively from wood cut within its borders.

Spruce is used in the flooring; the white pine is susceptible of a beautiful polish and is used in interior finish, also in shingles and lath; hemlock provides coarse lumber, and is used in construction for outside finish; the black birch is stronger than mahogany, its appearance is satiny, and, as it polishes beautifully, it makes a handsome interior trimming; the curled birch found in the northern part of the State has an attractive water grain and is much used as a veneer.

For interior finish few of the common woods equal the white birch, and it makes an admirable floor. The yellow birch is also satiny and takes a beautiful polish. The wood of the sugar maple is more valuable than any other of its genus, as it is a reddish brown, strong and heavy and capable of receiving a high polish. "Curled maple" and "birds-eye maple" are accidental forms of the sugar maple, in which the grain is beautifully curled and contorted. It is highly prized in cabinet making, interior decoration and furniture.

The soft maple or silver maple is used for flooring. The elastic tamarack or American larch is used for poles and posts. Cedar chests and closets are appreciated by thrifty housewives, as the wood is objectionable to moths. The black cherry is one of the most valuable woods of the American forest. Its texture is firm and durable, it has a satin-like surface which receives a beautiful polish, rendering it very desirable for chests and interior finishings. The color of the wood is light brown or red, growing darker with exposure and age. Ash saplings are very pliable, and this wood is found valuable for many uses. The beech polishes well, and is used, among other things, for chairs. Ironwood of this family is very durable, and is used for teeth in rakes. The swamp white oak and white oak closely resemble one another, and are used for carriages and in cabinetmaking.

No great has been the demand for the beautiful dark-brown wood of the black walnut, says the New York Post, that it has grown very rare. It has been estimated that fully one hundred years are required for this tree to attain the ample proportions necessary for a valuable timber tree. It has been more generally used for cabinetmaking, interior finish and for gunstocks than any other wood. In addition to these varieties there are many others, each having an individual commercial value, including the elm, buttonwood, basswood, balsam fir, the tree most often chosen from the forest for the Christmas tree, and the hickory.

For Spinsters.

In Sweden and Norway there are several homes for spinsters. One of these at least is as attractive as it is unique. It is the monument to the memory of an exceedingly wealthy old man, who, dying more than 200 years ago, left the major part of his fortune to the old maids among his descendants. A superb home was built, furnished and managed by salaried trustees. It flourished and has continued. It furnished married women who can prove blood relationship to the founder of the institution is entitled to admission in the home. She is given a suite of rooms, a servant, private meals, and is subject to no rules save such as ordinary good behavior demands.

God is the spring of our best activity and fullest energy; God is the haven of deep and untroubled rest.
